Bowers to retire from District

SAM YUN
NEWS AND OPINION EDITOR

After 24 years in the Palo Alto Unified School District (PAUSD) and 12 years of working as the PAUSD assistant superintendent, Sean Bowers will retire at the end of the school year.

Prior to working in the District office, Bowers spent nearly four years as Assistant Principal at Palo Alto High School. He later transitioned into the role of Principal at Fairmeadow Elementary School for eight years.

Bowers does not plan to stay in Palo Alto after retiring, but may seek out a part-time teaching position elsewhere.

"I'm retiring from the State Teacher Retirement System and I will start looking around and see what opportunities are there," Bowers said. "One thing that seems attractive would be to maybe go back into the classroom and teach part-time. I was a math teacher before I became an administrator so it'd be kind of fun to maybe go back and teach math."

Of all his experiences in PAUSD, hosting his first Chow Down Day event was his most memorable.

Budget cuts force exit of Associate Superintendent

McGee expects additional cuts to be made in future due to monetary constraints in District

NOAH BAUM

After 18 months, Associate Superintendent Markus McGee parted ways with the Palo Alto Unified School (PAUSD) in late December. Aurrey's position, second highest in the District, included supervising and monitoring the education and services of students pre-Kindergarten through 12th grade.

PAUSD Superintendent Max McGee, along with Director of Elementary Education Barbara Harris, Director of Secondary Education Sharon Ofek and Chief Student Services Officer Holly Wade, will divide up Aurrey's responsibilities at the District, according to McGee.

'Our budget shortfall is like gravity, it eventually asserts itself.'
Todd Collins
PAUSD Board of Education Member

Aurrey's departure was initially kept quiet because it is not a practice of the District to announce employee exits to the public, according to PAUSD Communications and Community Engagement Officer Jorge Quintana.

McGee initially discussed options with Aurrey soon after discovering a District budget deficit in June 2016.

According to Palo Alto Online, the deficit was a result of an approximate three percent drop in projected property-tax revenue.

The drop resulted in a total of a $5.2 million budget deficit, which was adjusted to $3.7 million due to a condition of the teacher's contract that takes one percent of teacher bonuses when the property-tax revenue is at least 1.5 percent less than the District's budget was planned on.

"It was a budgetary decision," McGee said. "[PAUSD] had this budget shortfall, so we had to make some immediate cuts."

McGee said he expects several ripples of those types of decisions to be made in the District moving forward.

"We are going to reorganize the District office, so we are going to have to eliminate more than one position here," McGee said.

In the case of any cuts, McGee said that the District tries to reassign staff to another position to the extent that is possible. This could include reassignment to teaching positions if the person has the qualifications.

Aurrey's departure was an administrative decision, and the Board of Education was not involved, according to McGee.

New Board member Todd Collins said cuts to positions like Aurrey's are inevitable for the District.

"Our budget shortfall is like gravity," Collins said. "It eventually asserts itself."

According to McGee, some projects will take longer for the district without Aurrey. This includes aligning class syllabuses and final assessments for all classes and working with the teachers' union on a new evaluation system.

McGee said he expects to announce further plans for restructuring and eliminating of other positions in April or May.

"It's difficult because it involves people," McGee said. "People who have done a good job."

Aurrey did not respond to The Campanile's request for an interview.

Living Wisdom alternative learning high school to open at Cubberley

New school values social-emotional learning and smaller classes

Students interested in alternative learning will now have the opportunity to apply to the new, private Living Wisdom High School located at the Cubberley Community Center in Palo Alto. In their applications, prospective students will answer questions focused on extracurricular interests and personal qualities. They will be evaluated on these questions in lieu of grades and test scores.

Until its first semester in fall, Living Wisdom will accept applications from students interested in alternative learning. Classes will incorporate activities such as daily mindfulness meditation, yoga and camping trips into their curricular while also providing core academic courses.

Living Wisdom, which already operates a kindergarten-through-eighth grade school in Palo Alto, describes "final a way of nurturing children that would be balanced and truly achieve their potentials mentally, emotionally, socially, academically, and spiritually," according to Living Wisdom Principal Kalvin MacDow.

The new high school will fulfill the University of California and California State University A-G requirements, and will abide by the Common Core curriculum. According to the Living Wisdom website, the school functions as an "alternative learning" school through the personalized learning that "provides real-world experience through volunteering, internships, in-depth study, … resulting in a meaningful, adventure-filled, journey of self-discovery."

Living Wisdom schools were first created in the early seventies in the Sierra Nevada Foothills. The program was originally established by Ananda, a spiritual community. However, in the 1990s, the schools adopted a different philosophy and became less affiliated with the organization. MacDow came to Living Wisdom in 1977, and was a teacher at the Sierra Nevada site for eight years. Since then, Living Wisdom has expanded into multiple sites, including Seattle, Portland and Nevada City.

MacDow explained that personalized learning can only be accomplished with small class sizes. As a result, Living Wisdom will only accept 15 to 20 students in the fall.

In an earlier interview with Palo Alto Online, MacDow stated that he hopes for 80 to 100 students to participate in the fourth year of the school's existence, as well as a more permanent location.

Living Wisdom will not only focus on the core subjects of math, science, language arts and social studies, but

Private student data temporarily leaked

Names, addresses and test scores of over 14,000 PAUSD students were publicly accessible

NOAH BAUM
STAFF WRITER

After targeting Schoolzilla, a former data warehouse platform of the Palo Alto Unified School District (PAUSD), a computer security researcher found the personal information of about 14,000 current and previous PAUSD students was exposed, as announced by the District last Thursday.

The information included students' names, school ID numbers, addresses, dates of birth, genders, test scores and information about 504 plans. Additionally, the data included the names of some parents in the District, according to the District.

Along with a notification of the leak to all PAUSD families via email, families with information in the data leak will receive a letter in the mail informing them of their situation. California Law requires the District send the notice in the mail, according to Derek Moore, the District's Chief Technology Officer.

"This is a very unfortunate and serious mistake that [Schoolzilla] made, but they have been very forthcoming — even telling us the mistake was made."
Derek Moore
PAUSD Chief Technology Officer

The District decided to enact the regular data breach protocol because the security researcher who accessed the unsecured data "Vickery" was not commissioned to access the data by either the District or Schoolzilla, according to Moore.

Vickery said in a blog post that 1.3 million students had information that was exposed during his targeting of Schoolzilla. Vickery discovered the information soon after Vickery reported it, he said.

Vickery said in his blog post that the "sheer volume" of student information he accessed convinced him to purge it from his storage in an "appalled fashion." MacDow's blog post describes Vickery's role as assisting companies in "plugging serious data exposure vulnerabilities."

Schoolzilla confirmed to the District that the only external user in their past data logs was Vickery, according to Moore.

The District also said in a letter to parents that Vickery provided a screen affidavit to Schoolzilla declaring he had deleted all of the data he accessed in the incident.

Social Security Numbers, California ID numbers and driver's license numbers were not exposed in the breach. PAUSD does not collect the any of the said information from families, according to the District.

According to Moore, Schoolzilla informed the District about the breach later than other users of the platform because PAUSD no longer uses the company's services and Schoolzilla did not intend to sell to the District's student data.

"It wasn't until [Schoolzilla] did further research that they figured out our data was still exposed there," Moore said.

Schoolzilla was supposed to delete the District's student data after PAUSD terminated its contract with the company in May 2016.

"This is a very unfortunate and serious mistake that [Schoolzilla] made," Moore said. "But they have

One Acts to feature six student plays

Students are in the early stages of rehearsing and directing their senior capstone productions as Palo Alto High School's theater department readies for its final production of the year. This year's One Acts showcase will feature six unique plays, all of which are student produced and directed.

Instead of a single long production that takes several months to prepare for, One Acts are several smaller shows created so students can participate in a low-stress production at the end of the year.

"I'm excited to see all the different variety of shows ranging from really funny shows to more dramatic ones," said junior Sam Kim.

The One Acts productions are generally favored by the Paly Theatre Department because they give students the opportunity to try different aspects of theater that they would not otherwise have tried.

"It's really fun, involve and it's a really great time to go outside your comfort zone," Kim said. "I know a lot of actors that are working lights and sound and just the technical aspects of the show while there's actually a lot of [stage technicians] here that are actors. It also allows students the chance to produce and direct shows."

The production, "Dinner Time," is going out of her comfort zone for One Acts by doing multiple stage jobs for the production.

Sex ed curriculum sparks controversy

Parents protest "vulgar" new program reforms

RENEE HOH

A petition against the newly implemented sex education curriculum by the Palo Alto Unified School District (PAUSD) middle schools garnered 1,800 signatures both online and in person in regard to the potentially explicit and sexy-inappropriate content. The petition was presented to the PAUSD Board members at the District office meeting on April 18.

The petition cites the "age and cultural inappropriateness" of the curriculum in "highlighted excerpts of the Health Connected program, Teen Talk for seventh graders.

"The petition had a lot of misleading information and parts of the curriculum taken out of context and didn't have all the information necessary, which may have alarmed some parents."
Laura Prentiss
PAUSD Parent

Additionally, the petition states the curriculum promotes risky behavior such as underage drinking, drug use and increased students' curiosity in sexual activities.

The topic was discussed during the open forum portion of the board meeting. Over 20 individuals, ranging from community members to parents to students, spoke for or against the new sex education curriculum.

Parents opposed to the new curriculum argue that the scenarios, which include the termination of pregnancies with sex, may be insensitive to cultural values, contain explicit descriptions of oral, anal and vaginal sex and feature 14- to 18-year-olds rather than the target audience of seventh graders.

People from different cultural backgrounds have different values they use to raise their children," said Farha Andrabi Nevald, a PAUSD parent. "In order to teach sex education we do not have to use material which might be considered vulgar in certain cultural or religious viewpoints."

Other individuals spoke out in favor of Health Connected program and how PAUSD has addressed the issue of sex education.

"The petition had a lot of misleading information and parts of the curriculum taken out of context and didn't have all the information necessary, which may have alarmed some parents," said PAUSD parent Laura Prentiss. "I think the program itself is very good and very necessary."

Parents in favor of the program also argue the real world scenarios provide students with clearer and more realistic viewpoints about sex.

ASB hosts annual volleyball tournament

Paly's most popular intramural sport entertains students on the quad

Palo Alto High School's most popular intramural sport tournament drew an impressive crowd this past week.

ASB presented the fourth annual Spring Volleyball Tournament that took place on April 24-28 on the quad during lunch time.

Kaare Ornazian, ASB Sports Commissioner, encouraged all students to come out and cheer on the teams.

As a participant himself last year, Ornazian learned that having a large audience when playing is very motivating.

"I'm confident that with the crowds, the games participating in audience size will grow as well," Ornazian said.

This year's tournament experienced a larger turnout. Just on the first day the 2016 champions, the Dab Daddies, lost during the first round.

The level of competition in the courts rose higher when compared to last year.

A particular team that gained attention quickly during the five days of the tournament is Team24, primarily a YMCA basketball team. However, they expanded their horizons and served as the tournament's underdogs.

"We came in nervous, we heard they had game," said junior Team 24 member Ole Erikson. "But we competed and were able to pull out a big win. It feels as if we got the best furniture in the tournament."

Each team was allowed up to eight members with a quorum of six members.

The only requirements was that each team had to include at least one underclassman and one upperclassman. Teams also could not consist of more than five players from the same grade or more than one varsity player per team.

ASB posted online and used on-campus publicity to acquire participants early on.

Volleyball nets were set up two weeks prior to the tournament to promote the event. The top three winning teams received gift cards to various businesses, worth $20, $15 and $10 dollars.

Tournament brackets were chosen randomly and posted outside the Student Activities Office, on Schoology and on ASB Social Media.

Dauber, Dharap sworn onto School Board

Close election for two open seats finally determined after weeks of counting

By Julia Tayoni
Business Manager

After a tight race for the two open seats on Palo Alto Unified School District (PAUSD) Board of Education, incumbent Ken Dauber and Shounak Dharap were sworn in yesterday.

Although Dauber had strongly secured the re-election with a substantial lead within the first day the returns of the other seat remained undecided. The seat ultimately to be awarded through two several days.

Despite the considerably close competition from special interestes advocate Bayan Adhami and PAUSD parent Kathy Jordan, Dharap was able to gain a 1,172 vote lead over Adhami based on 55 percent of the ballots that were counted by Nov. 13.

"People looked at me and saw me as someone who was younger, a community member, and someone who could serve the school district. I felt truly honored and grateful."
Shounak Dharap

Since the results were still significantly unclear, Adhami was required to be announced for her non-calling the results of the race. "What happened was, the county had REALLY bad timing," Adhami commented. "Dharap and Dauber had a lead that was so clear, the county decided to stop the tally of the ballots that were counted by Nov. 13.

Nevertheless, Dharap was able to maintain and widen his numerous lead and the other candidate, eventually ending with 23.4 percent of the vote as opposed to Adhami's 21.6 percent.

According to Dharap, his victory made himself proud of the position impact he has made on the community.

According to Dharap, it was his young age, his ability to connect with community members and recognition of the importance of the character of election.

"[My victory] showed me that it didn't matter that I was a non-traditional candidate, or a young one," Dharap said. "People looked at me and saw me as someone who was younger, a community member, and someone who could serve the school district. I felt truly honored and grateful."

Adhami conceded to Dharap on Nov. 16, congratulating him with a phone call. Dauber conceded strongly also conceding the race with 27.1 percent, joining Dharap in the winning seats.

According to Dharap, his victory made himself proud of the position impact he has made on the community.

Newly-elected Board members were administered the oath of office at the School Board meeting on Dec. 4.

"I felt extremely grateful for the community members that supported me," Dharap said. "I felt honored to serve back the community that gave me so much."

On Dec. 4 at 6:30 p.m., Dharap and Dauber were sworn in as new members of the Board of Education. Afterwards, the Board of Education, the District Superintendent, Max McGee, and the Board of Education's attorney, Jennifer Nelson, gave a brief overview of the Board's upcoming agenda.

University of California sued for discrimination

By Eva Dunnavilly

UCLA has petitioned Richard Sander, a civil rights lawyer, to sue the University of California Board of Regents, alleging the school failed to defend admissions data. A court ruling is currently in the works against Harvard University.

Sander, a UCLA graduate accused of discriminating against Asian American students in the admissions process, as well as favoring students identifying as Latino or African American. The UCLA class ranking dot to a proportion passed in 1998 stating California schools cannot allow gender, race or ethnicity to be a factor in admissions.

Under California's public record laws, Sander, among other petitioners, has requested a variety of data regarding undergraduate applicants and currently enrolled students. This includes data regarding scores, high school and college grades, race, ethnicity, income.

Sander challenged Klein's claim that the undergraduate information is incomplete given the data set he seeks is anonymized. Sander further explains that UC does not have a compiled list of all applicants, and it simply does not exist.

The information on the Factsheet of Undergraduate Education has found that more people in the US are attending college than ever before. Given the 37 percent of millennial high school graduates attend college within eight years. This growing population of students creates a new climate of competition surrounding college admissions.

Camp Fire smoke affects students

Local Bay Area communities and schools respond to poor air quality

By Nick Lu
Senior Staff Writer

Students have successfully evacuated 150 percent of the Camp Fire, the deadliest fire in California history as of Nov. 21 according to California Department of Forestry and Fire Protection (Cal Fire). The fire, which burned 153,336 acres in Paradise, Gold Ridge, has claimed 88 lives and destroyed 18,738 structures. The cause of the fire is still under investigation. The fire affected thousands of people, injuring 12 citizens and has forced students and staff to leave their homes.

Cal Fire estimated the cost of damage amounts to $1 billion. Fire has reached 87 to 93 billion dollars in damage, the most costly wildfire. Also notoriously smoke from the area affected forced schools around the Bay Area.

Chico State University, which is 27 miles from Paradise, started Thanksgiving break early.

"The fire really affected me in terms of school," Chico junior Vincent Lo said. "Because my grades couldn't control the weather, I had to make up for the time I was forced to adjust my school schedule to account for falling grades because material was lost. Fairly."

The smoke from the fire quickly spread, reaching as far as Napa and the Bay Area. This affected many people including Lo.

"The air quality was terrible for several days as well," Lo said. "I, along with many people around me, had to wear masks, which made me feel as NH masks I was really uncomfortable with at first, but it was necessary."

California is a state that is at risk for fire, which is indicated by the many fires in recent years.

For example, the Mendocino Complex fire, Cate fire and Thomas fire all took place from 2017 to 2018. This has caused the to believe that change is necessary.

"I would like to see more funding and effort into preventing fires, rather than only the aftermath of global warming," Lo said. "Fighting global warming will bring our climate back to normal, making fires less frequent and less dangerous."

Many schools all across Northern California closed down due to air quality. Sonoma State Mariposa a move to the Davis campus, which is about 70 miles, and dwell in the unhealthy air.

"Many people had dealt with some difficulty in transfer or dual enrolment issues," Marriott said. "But they were fairly simple and easy to be present this. We encouraged people to use online classes and when they had to go classroom we tried to make it easy."

Lo believes people should take more action to prevent the fire, but also should be more prepared in case of a fire in the future.

"I think that the public respector was appropriate," he said. "Schools rightfully canceled classes due to poor air quality, and the department made their best effort to respect South Bay students and to prepare in the event that a fire would spread."

Lo is in the process of finding ways to contain their times per day. In addition, I did notice many people have to be getting NH masks, so keeping them in mind for the upcoming fire season is important in the event that a fire would spread."

Shifting Feminist Ideals

An insight into how different religious, economic and racial backgrounds affect feminist ideals

Text, Art & Design by Lucy Nemerov & Frida Rivera

Has anything changed?

Feminism. To some people, it's a dirty word. To others, it's an integral part of identity. Does it mean "martyrdom"? Or does it mean "empowerment"?

Some people say it's outdated, and others criticize it for focusing too much on first world concerns.

However, feminists say it can never be out-dated because equality has not yet been won, and the fight for equality for women concerns all women, in both the United States and around the world.

Yet, the feminist movement in the U.S. has come under criticism for being dominated by white women.

The drive for a more inclusive movement and for a broader definition of normal means has grown in recent years, as black, Latino and Asian-American movements have sought a seat at the feminist table.

It wasn't all that long ago that women could even consider having a political voice in the U.S. The right to vote came in 1920, with the ratification of the 19th Amendment to the Constitution.

Suffragettes built their part of the feminist movement on the ground plowed by American women starting in 1848, when women gathered at the Seneca Falls Conference to discuss equity in social, civil and religious spheres.

Today, 170 years later, the feminist movement still struggles as disparities in the workplace and political power persist.

Many of these problems are relevant to all women, of any race, ethnicity or religion. However, the feminist movement also is realizing that other concerns of specific racial, ethnic or religious groups overlap with feminist issues and present an opportunity to tackle problems on a broader front.

White Feminism vs. Intersectional Feminism

Junior Emma Donelly-Higgins, president of the Poly Feminists Club, advocates for the inclusion of all racial identities in the feminist movement to build her roles as club leader and a frequent participant of women's rights protests. Donelly-Higgins said it's important to understand the difference between White and Intersectional Feminism.

"Intersectional Feminism is a branch of feminism that encompasses women of varying economic, religious and racial identities, whereas White Feminism seems to only play to the advantage of prosperous white women," Donelly-Higgins said.

The Bay Area is home to many women's groups raising the importance of Intersectional Feminism.

For example, The Women's Building, a center founded in 1979 by a group of Latina women and women of color who did not feel welcomed at other women's centers in San Francisco. The center provides social services and works with non-profits in order to promote women's movements in the area.

Founded in 1979, The Women's Building is a community center that focuses on empowering, mobilizing and engaging women in the feminist movement.

Vylena Ortiz, an advocacy specialist at the San Francisco The Women's Building, said she focuses on helping women who face sexual assault and harassment in addition to promoting movements such as #MeToo.

"I think everyone's welcome in the movement, but many times, the standard is coming from a white lens," Ortiz said. "People forget that there are Native, black, LatinX and disabled women. Not everyone is the standard white woman."

Atiatra May, a junior Asian-American leader in the Poly Feminists club, said the importance of Intersectional Feminism lies in the new perspective it brings to the feminist movement.

"It's really important to look through the lens of how it affects different sects of women," May said. "Not just focusing on one group of women specifically, but looking at several layers of the problem. For example, looking at what problems affect a woman in a lower social class or of a different race can really broaden your view on the feminist community."

Donelly-Higgins said she sees Intersectional Feminism as an opportunity to stand with all women while still allowing women of color to lead their own movements.

> 'People forget that there are Native, black, lesbian, LatinX and disabled women.'
> Vylena Ortiz

"I don't think it's necessarily about helping women of color — it's more standing in solidarity with women of color," Donelly-Higgins said. "It's so important to speak for women of color and people of color to prevent They are the leaders of their own movement."

> 'I'm really outwardly feminist and liberal, and I've noticed a lot of guys, either behind my back or to my face, will call me crazy.'
> Emma Donelly-Higgins

Poly sophomore Isabella Kostanzaurus, a Mexican-American female in the Social Justice Pathway, said she is thankful for the efforts of feminists on the Latino community.

"I appreciate anyone supporting the feminist movement no matter what race they are," Kostanzaurus said. "Whether that means you are black, Asian, white or any other race, we are all fighting for the same goals."

Kostanzaurus said she has seen the negative effects when feminists turn against other feminists.

"I hear people sometimes bashing White Feminism, but in my opinion, attacking each other distracts from the other problems at hand," Kostanzaurus said.

No movement for social justice can progress without backlash, and as an outspoken advocate for women's rights, Donelly-Higgins is no stranger to retaliation, especially from men.

"I'm really outwardly feminist and liberal, and I've noticed a lot of guys, either behind my back or to my face, will call me crazy," Donelly-Higgins said.

Acknowledging the accusation that her views are 'radical', Donelly-Higgins said, "You have to be crazy to believe in this sort of thing because it's crazy, and it's something different. If you want equity, you are believing in an extremely progressive society, which is nothing like we have right now."

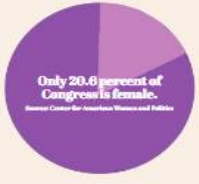
Another common misconception within the feminist movement is that all women experience sexism and discrimination in the same way.

According to Ortiz, it is not that one sub-group faces objectively worse discrimination than another, rather, that their experiences differ.

"The different levels of privilege that women have either compounds or alleviates the problems of sexism and misogyny," Ortiz said.

Despite being a prominent leader in the Poly feminist community, Donelly-Higgins said she does not want to problem-solve on the behalf of women who experience inequalities that she does not face.

"I am not a woman of color, so I can never truly know how the problem affects women of color and what the best solution would be," Donelly-Higgins said. "Only women of color do. However, this is in no way an excuse to stay silent on the issue, therefore being complicit. Consult your friends of color and listen with open ears. Elevate their voices."



Intersection between culture and feminism

From the age of 12, Poly senior Noor Nawad has made sacrifices in her morning routine for an additional item of clothing: a hijab.

Attending an Islamic school in the Bay Area at that age, Nawad was often surrounded by girls doing the same.

> 'Depending on what your tribe and parents are like in Kenya, teens will either wear miniskirts and showy clothes or dress very covered.'
> Esther Kagiri

According to Nawad, the commitment to a hijab is a big one. Along with draping a scarf over her hair, Nawad also has to cover her legs and her arms up to her elbows.

"Making the decision to wear a hijab was huge," Nawad said. "To Islam, being a caretaker or mother is a very special type of love and is very respected. The Quran never says that women aren't supposed to work, and instead women are expected to be educated, being the foundation of a family, biologically."

> 'The reasoning behind the hijab is not the same in the 21st century as it used to be.'
> Noor Nawad

According to Nawad, using her religious attire as a form of empowerment and connection to her religion is something she holds dear.

"My favorite thing about my hijab is that it removes the focus away from physical appearance of a woman and more on their personality and humanity," Nawad said. "I feel that the society is too focused on defining standards of beauty for women, and conforming to those standards can be oppressive to many women."

Although Nawad made the personal choice to wear a hijab, some women are pressured to dress in a certain way based on cultural traditions.

Wearing ripped jeans and a crop top, Poly senior Esther Kagiri dresses in the typical attire of a Palo Alto teen. Kagiri recalls changing her attire when she moved here from Kenya.

"Depending on what your tribe and parents are like in Kenya, teens will either wear miniskirts and showy clothes," Kagiri said. "Here there are tribes who dress very covered, like me, where I used wear a turtleneck and leggings under a dress."

For Kagiri, the largest influence on her use of clothing was her mother.

"My mom really wanted me to present myself in a respectable way, which reflects on both me and her," Kagiri said.

According to Kagiri, her father's attitude towards her choice of clothing has changed.

Kagiri said, "After having lived in the United States for many years, my dad has seen how people wear here and is now much more flexible to what I wear, unlike my mom."

According to Nawad, being a caretaker or mother is a very special type of love and is very respected. The Quran never says that women aren't supposed to work, and instead women are expected to be educated, being the foundation of a family, biologically."

"I think that the reasoning behind the hijab is not the same in the 21st century as it used to be," Nawad said. "To me, the meaning of a hijab is a form of repulsing women. Back in the day, slave women would not wear hijabs, but modest women would, which was a sign of respect and was equalizing for women and men."

According to Nawad, a verse from the Quran gives a good insight into the Islamic concept of gender, social and racial equality: "O mankind, indeed, We have created you from male and female and made you peoples and tribes that you may know one another. Indeed, the most noble of you in the sight of Allah is the most righteous of you. Indeed, Allah is Knowing, and Acquainted," (49:13).

"Basically, this verse is saying that you've been created as men and women, but the best of you are the ones who do the most good in the world," Nawad said. "To Islam, being a caretaker or mother is a very special type of love and is very respected. The Quran never says that women aren't supposed to work, and instead women are expected to be educated, being the foundation of a family, biologically."

Is feminism outdated?

Some people think the feminist movement has become unnecessary in a crusade against the male sex.

"Feminism was important in the 1960s, not anymore," junior Jackson Drake said. "It was important for the the 19th Amendment and getting women to be treated with more respect in the workplace, the field of education and in the civil rights movement."

As a conservative, Drake stands out in Poly's mostly liberal student body.

In Drake's eyes, the feminist movement has been twisted into an excuse to demonize men, and its purpose is no longer clear or necessary.

"I feel like it's become more of a misandrist movement that is attempting to blame all faults of society on men, which is why I don't consider myself a feminist," Drake said. "I think that it has become something that it wasn't supposed to be. It started something that was very useful into one what it used to be."

According to Mao, there are members of the feminist movement who are misguided in their definition of feminism. However, that group is a small minority, she said.

"Of course, there are going to be some people in the feminist movement who are more radical and are demonizing men, but the whole point is looking for equity for all genders," Mao said.

Drake said the basis his argument off his interpretation of the Constitution.

According to him, the document outlines the positive state of inequality between different groups in present-day America.

"Constitutionally, men and women have the same rights," Drake said. "I don't think that men should have any more rights. I don't think that women should. I don't think that LGBTQ people should have any more rights. I think it's good how it is."

> 'I think people in the feminist movement are just sin gling out those radical people and generalizing our whole group.'
> Jackson Drake

But, according to Mao, although the Constitution outlines equality between men and women, there are still many institutional inequalities that cannot be dictated.

"To bring up the wage gap, for example, you can compare white women to white men, and that is a significant difference," Mao said. "But then if you compare Latina women, it's much worse."

Although Drake is anti-feminist, he objects to being labelled as anti-women's rights and does not buy into stereotypes about conservative men.

Drake said, "many people say conservatives are misogynistic, which comes by definition, the hatred towards women. Feminists are individuals in the conservative community who are outspoken and assume that their opinions speak for everyone. There are definitely people who are anti-women. People in the feminist movement are singling out those people and generalizing our whole group as those people."
